PUBLIC COURTESY CODE

§ 3.02

This vehicle is stopped in a live travel lane, blinking, as though blinking makes it legal. The Department has reviewed the doctrine that hazard lights convert any location into a parking space, and rejects it in full. "One second" was nine minutes ago.

§ 3.01

And yet. This vehicle is parked in a bike lane. A bike lane with a car in it is not a bike lane – it is a trap with paint on it, and every cyclist it pushed into live traffic would like a word. You can't park there. You never could.

PUBLIC COURTESY CODE

§ 3.04

This vehicle is occupying two parking spaces. There were lines. The lines were right there. Parking between them is among the easier things a licensed driver is asked to do.

PUBLIC COURTESY CODE

§ 3.03

This vehicle entered an intersection it had no hope of clearing, and now it lives there, blocking a crosswalk and a green light in two directions. Everyone saw. Everyone is still seeing.

PUBLIC COURTESY CODE

§ 3.06

The signal turned green four-tenths of a second ago and this vehicle is already leaning on the horn. The horn is a safety device. It is not a stopwatch, a mood, or a way to tell an entire block that you have somewhere to be.

PUBLIC COURTESY CODE

§ 3.05

Somebody stopped. Somebody let this vehicle in. And this vehicle proceeded without so much as a hand raised in acknowledgment. The wave costs nothing. The wave is the entire social contract of driving. Render the wave.

PUBLIC COURTESY CODE

§ 3.08

This vehicle is parked across the ramp – the one place on the entire block a wheelchair, a walker, or a stroller can get from street to sidewalk. It took somebody years of organizing to get that ramp built. It took this vehicle nine seconds to close it.

PUBLIC COURTESY CODE

§ 3.07

A folding chair, a traffic cone, and a laundry basket now occupy a public parking space, and their owner has gone inside. The Department acknowledges the shoveling. The Department acknowledges the effort. The Department notes that the street remains, legally and spiritually, everyone's.
